Specialised MBA: A Growing Trend Among Students

The conventional Master of Business Administration degree that most of us are known with, is a General MBA with specialisations in very limited business functions like Finance, Marketing, HR etc. On the other hand, a Specialised MBA is a management degree that is focused on an industry sector (E.g., Aviation or Petroleum), a field of work (E.g., Industrial Engineering or Analytics), or like the General MBA, on a business function (E.g., Finance or Foreign Trade).

Also, in a General MBA, the number of credits for a specialisation or area of concentration would be much less than in a Specialised MBA programme.

For one, there is an ever-growing demand for higher education and skills across the world. Secondly, the recurring complaint of recruiters during campus placement drives is that students lack practical knowledge and skills. Thirdly, the management education segment is seeing an increasing number of players. Hence, both Institutes and students wish to create a USP (Unique Selling Proposition) for themselves.

These issues can be addressed by the Specialised MBA programme whose students would be industry-ready in every sense of the word, their skills being more practical and application-oriented than a General MBA, and customized to a specific industry sector. Hence, ideal candidates for a Specialised MBA would be those who are clear about their area of focus and interest (business function/industry/field of work), or who already have work experience in the same. On the other hand, if one is unsure of where one wants to specialize, or an experienced worker looking for a career change, it might be better to take up a General MBA course where the exposure to various business functions as well as industries would help in deciding where they would like to be employed.
